

Practicing Knowledge Translation (PKT)

is a professional development course on how to apply KT science to real-world implementation projects to enhance and sustain project outcomes.

What is Knowledge Translation (KT)?

Knowledge translation (KT) bridges research evidence and practice in an effort to strengthen health systems and improve health outcomes. But how do we actually do KT? At the KT Program, our approach to KT is rooted in theory and science, but our application of KT is uniquely pragmatic and focused on real-world impact.

What is Practicing Knowledge Translation (PKT)?

The Practicing Knowledge Translation (PKT) course is a professional development course on how to apply KT science to real-world implementation projects to enhance and sustain project outcomes.

The course focuses on empowering individuals and organizations in the health system with the knowledge, skills, and support to effectively do KT by learning how to:

- Develop an Evidence-informed, Theory-driven Program (ETP)
- Map barriers & facilitators to change using theories and frameworks
- Systematically select and operationalize implementation strategies
- Plan for implementation, evaluation and sustainability

Who should consider taking PKT?

PKT is geared towards individuals in any health-related discipline (e.g., health care, public health, mental health) who are responsible for implementing change. Previous participants have come from a range of organizations (e.g., hospitals, funding organizations, and government agencies) with a variety of backgrounds (e.g., educators, managers, clinicians, knowledge brokers, researchers).

Since 2015, PKT has been delivered to 133 participants across 6 cohorts of KT practitioners in 4 countries (Australia, Ethiopia, Uganda, and Canada).
